Harmony in Dress

In costumes, nothing is more co ple and green. Now, be the dress or connet ever so well made, and the wearer ever so beautiful, the effect of such the addition of a third may make a harmonious group. The same rule holds good with three or more colors. There are two kinds of harmony acknowledged in the grouping of colors, namely, the harmony of contrast and colors which are dissimilar are associated agreeably, such as blue and orange, or lilac and cherry, they form a harmony of contrast. And when two clierant tones of one color are and colors which are they form a harmony of contrast. And when two distant tones of one color are and colors which are distant tones of one color are and colors. There in them than in beets, and that the establishment of the factory will furnish a market for the many hundred tons of that class of produce that are usually left to rot in the fieldsafter the market becomes glutted.

Norman was stred by Priace Imperial, he being imported from France by Degna Bros., Ill., and stood for marce at $40 to insure a $400 to far. Lewelly and sold to Mr. Lewe when two distant tones of one color are associated, such as very light and very dark blue, they harmonize by contrast. Of course in the latter instance, the harmeny is neither so striking nor so per-

When two colors are grouped which are similar to each other in disposition. such as orange and scarlet, crimson and crimson-brown, or orange and orangebrown, they form a harmony of analogy. And if two or more tones of one color be associated, closely approximating in intensity, they harmonize by analogy.

The harmonies of contrast are m effective, although not more important than those of analogy; the former are characterized by brilliany and decision while the latter are peculiar for their quiet, retiring and undemonstrative nature. In affairs of dress both hold equal proper species of harmony. The simplest rules to be observed are the following: First, when a color is selected is advisable to associate tints which will when they pay visits. At Rome it was tion of contrasting colors would diminish its favorable effect. Second, when a color is employed in dress which is injurious to the complexion, contrasting begun the 11th or 12th century. The colors must be associated with it, as they benediction was pronounced with particular solemnity on the fourth Sunday may know how the different varieties of colors should be tones of itself (slightly lighter or darker), which will rather enhance than reduce its effect. As an example of the second rule, I may take violet, which, although unsuitable to brunettes, may be rendered agreeable by having tones of yellow or orange grouped with it.

Colors of similar power which contrast with each other mutually intensify each other's brilliancy, as blue and orange scarlet and green. When dark and very light colors are associated they do not intensify each other in the same manner, the dark color is made to appear deeper and the light lighter, as dark blue or almost indiscriminately to any traveling straw color, or any dark color and the prince who would pay a sum equivalent published, and the falsehoods of those light tints of complexion. Colors which to about £400 in fees for it.—Pall Mall who have been talking of the stealings of Gazette. harmonize with each other by analogy reduce each other's brilliancy to a greater or less degree, as white and yellow, blue and purple, black and brown.

In dress it is objectionable to associate together different hues of one color, for instance, yellow-green and blue-green, or orange-brown and purple-brown. Care must therefore be taken in selecting different tones of color to see that they belong to the same scale.

There is another fact which I wish to bring before your readers ere I close these remarks on the harmony of color,

Is any Brother in Distress?

Let us drive from the sacred portals all mean and sordid methods of dodging a responsibility that we profess and substitute something noble, honest, worthy of and in consonance with our broad professions. Let this substitute be acts row to leave you an opinion of their of charity, not promises of great things we never intend performing. Let us study to be generous—that is, to be true and just to our outward professions.

In this study, let each grange develop a definite and reliable plan. When the question is asked, is any brother or sister sick or in distress, let the question be answered calmly, justly, and with fraternal solicitude. Let the world feel that the grange really does protect and aid its members, when they need aid, and the battle is won.
